JOB MARKET PAPER	[3] Sachin B. Badole, Martin D. Heintzelman. "Rooftop Solar or a New Kitchen: Do Rooftop Solar Systems Capitalize into Home Values?" This paper estimates the effect of residential rooftop solar systems on housing resale prices using single-family home transactions and hedonic and repeat-sales models. We find that homes sold with solar systems have an average price premium of 5.6% ($16,613), exceeding the average net installation cost of solar ($14,781) and implying that homeowners recover approximately 112% of their solar investment upon resale. Capitalization is strongest within the first three years after installation and declines thereafter, consistent with a gradual shift from capitalized resale value to realized electricity bill savings as systems age. We also find that premiums are higher for owned than leased systems and in metropolitan areas. The findings provide new evidence on solar capitalization in a low-penetration solar market and offer insights for homeowners, policymakers, and solar market stakeholders.
